Suburra in ancient Roman times was a crowded lower-class area that was also notorious as a red-light district. It lies in the dip between the southern end of the Viminal and the western end of the Esquiline hills. Most of its inhabitants lived in insulae, tall apartment buildings with tabernae on the ground floor. Julius Caesar grew up in a family home (domus) in the Subura district, as the Subura had grown up around the property many years before his birth.
