MONDOGRAFIE

A video-documentary session presented by Francesco Strazzari (Tue, August 31, h. 21:00)

Understanding the global era means looking beyond official accounts and beyond formal economic, social and political relations - exploring the nexus that exists between licit and illicit phenomena. 'Mondografie' is a one-night event that critically scans selected global issues with an eye to the informal, the unofficial and the illegal, through an attempt not to lose contact with daily experience. Through the language of innovative video-documentaries, 'Mondografie' stirs the waters around a wide gamut of topical questions, such as resource scarcity, migrations, massive urbanization, informal economies, food emergency, public health, illicit trafficking, financial flows and contemporary wars.

Room 1

Caracas, the Informal City

Rob Schröder, 2007, 49 min

Over the past few decennia, like a magnet gone mad, Caracas, the most violent megacity on the South-American continent, has drawn in millions of migrants. Now more than four out of its six million inhabitants live in self built constructions in the barrios where only the laws of the strong rule. Caracas the informal city tells the inside story of the new informal urban developments, exploring our changing world - the great debate over globalization, architecture and the future of our society.

Hunger

Karin Steinberger, Marcus Vetter, Germany, 2009, 90 min

With genetically modified crops, technological progress, global warming and demand for raw materials, the world at the start of the 20th century is changing dramatically, primarily to cater to the needs of the rich. The already miserable standard of living in poor countries continues to deteriorate in tandem with these changes, and a new food shortage emergency is looming in 2010. Whereas the biggest problem in the USA is obesity, just a few kilometres to the south in Haiti, there are people who are so poor that they have to sell their own children into slavery. Moreover, in Brazil, corrupt politicians look on as insatiable timber companies continue chopping down the Amazon rainforest, thereby contributing to global warming. This results in more frequent and deadly droughts in sub-Saharan Africa. In India, thousands of farmers eagerly embrace the dream of genetically modified rice. But when it doesn't rain, they don't even get the same harvest that they used to in the past. Hunger is a film that takes a detailed and shocking look at people and communities on three continents trapped by current international circumstances.

Mexico's Drug War

Katya Adler, BBC, 2010, 60 min. Downloaded from YouTube.

Room 2

Be water my friend

Antonio Martino, 2009, 12 min

An expanse of sand dotted by rusting ship relics: this is the panorama from the shores of Lake Aral in Uzbekistan. Using historic footage and eyewitness accounts, Antonio Martino introduces into a brief social journey through water, and documents the aftermath of a catastrophe and symbol of man's impact on nature.

Niguri

Antonio Martino, 2009, 50 min

Sant'Anna is a tiny Calabrian village hosting one of the biggest asylum seekers camp in Europe. The link between mafia and racism, the exploitation of migrant labor, the antechamber of the recent violence in Rosarno.

Health for Sale

Michele Mellara, Alessandro Rossi, Mammutfilm, 2007, 52 min

Why is it that in the southern hemisphere 15 million people die each year from easily curable diseases? In the search for an answer to this question, Michele Mellare and Alessandro Rossi have conducted an accurate, in-depth enquiry into the mechanisms behind the monopoly held by Big Pharma, i.e. the cartel of the five major drugs manufacturers, which, directly or indirectly, is responsible for the persistence of apparently irresolvable public health emergencies. By showing the ties between the World Trade Organization (WTO), the drugs firms and the governments of the developed countries, and by focusing on the contentious relationship between the WTO's Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS), pharmaceutical patents and public health, this exploration reveals how the drugs giants block access to essential medicines.

H.O.T. - Human Organ Traffic

Roberto Orazi and Riccardo Neri, 2009, 61 min

H.O.T. recounts one of the darker sides of globalisation, the international illegal organ

Violence is running out of control in Mexico as rival drug cartels battle over the smuggling routes to America. Mexico's president has declared war on the gangsters but the only result appears to be an escalation of the killings. Katya Adler journeys deep into the heart of a shocking conflict, uncovering the human stories behind the seemingly random and disturbing violence. She asks whether the continuing freedom of the world's most powerful drug runner, Joaquin 'Chapo' Guzman, is evidence that the Government's war is toothless.

trade, an uncomfortable truth that is both widespread and flourishing. H.O.T underscores one of the biggest disparities of the 21st century, where one part of the world becomes ever richer while sterile, and the other poorer but fertile. The protagonists of the documentary are men, women and children, of different cultures, religions and social statuses, who, with their individual stories of desperation, are somehow interlinked with the larger planetary events. On one side the necessity to survive poverty at any price, on the other, those willing to pay whatever price, to survive. Unfortunately for many, that amount of money that promises a better life, often represents a momentary and fleeting illusion... life does not improve and instead plunges those individuals further into desperation.
