

UNICA EduLAB European Conference

26-27 May
Blended format
(in Bucharest & online)

Design of European degrees – Building flexible pathways beyond academic cycles

Promoted by the University of Bucharest – Interdisciplinary School of Doctoral Studies (ISDS) in partnership with UNICA and CIVIS

Convenors

Romiță IUCU, President of the Board of Trustees, University of Bucharest, and Bogdan MURGESCU, Vice-Rector, University of Bucharest

Concept note

The Rome Communiqué, while drawing attention to the necessity of flexible and open learning paths as a means for better responding to the students' needs, challenges the academic communities to innovate the higher education landscape by offering new forms of teaching and learning. Innovative models are not restricted to "traditional" degrees, but they can appeal to modern and flexible curricular reshapes, such as modularisation, short-term learning, digitally enhanced (virtual) mobility, and micro-credentials. It shouldn't be considered that curricular innovation in HE is only linked to the universities' educational offer. Creating attractive flexible learning pathways associated with the professional dynamics and the society's needs for present-day qualifications offers not only a noticeable image for the universities, but especially addresses the students' need for more flexible, individualised and job-linked learning pathways. Another effect would be reducing inequalities and discrepancies in the academic communities, thus increasing access to HE.

Universities need to stand at the forefront of leading the trend for innovating the learning environment, evolving societal needs, and tackling global issues and community development.

The pace of change in learning has been drastically speeded-up during the last years, with a significant impact on digitalisation, pedagogical approach, equal access to opportunities, inclusion and learning mobility / portability. The new educational paradigms, seen in many cases as real challenges for the education of the future, can represent opportunities for adopting greater learning flexibility in a digitally enhanced environment, with a special focus on new ways of designing learning in higher education.

European Higher Education, especially through the European Universities initiative and the new objectives of the European Higher Education Area, becomes the most suitable arena for testing and refining innovative ways of transforming this educational offer from a one-to-all model towards agile and personalised learning opportunities at a larger, European scale, through the European Degrees.

By embedding different innovative components, such as micro-credentials, digitally enhanced mobilities, learning portability and digital credentials, flexible curricula and modularisation of learning, European Degrees become not just innovative products of the future of education, but can play the role of key levers for achieving real transformations and building up new fully recognisable and portable learning pathways models in higher education.

In this challenging conceptual and empirical context, this event intends to continue the discussions already launched at the European level and identify new directions for action by addressing the following questions:

- What are the main challenges in these processes and how can European approaches reshape this endeavour, supporting not only European Universities, but the entire educational landscape for valid transformations?
- How can existing structures and experiences support and enhance future developments, in relation with academic degrees, doctoral education, scientific networking, and university cooperation?
- How can new tools, such as joint programmes, micro-credentials, and digitally enhanced mobility, be used to better cater to the changing needs of students, academics, and institutions?
- How can we build new governance models for Higher Education innovation; which are the main stakeholders and what types of structural changes can they generate for the future?
- What is the envisaged architecture and how can it work on a vision for European and international Higher Education and Research in the second quarter of the 21st century? What needs to be changed and what is to be kept?

The programme of the conference is designed to provide answers to those questions and create a baseline for new philosophical and structural approaches as ways to innovate teaching, learning, recognition, and internationalisation in European Higher Education.

Conference outcomes: Towards the European Degree

The discussions and debates at the conference shall result in the release of a Conference Statement, tackling some of the main ideas and issues addressed below:

- Solutions and ideas for solving the main obstacles encountered in the development of new joint programmes;
- Proposals on how to enhance the European approach with a view to match the European Universities Alliances' needs, including aspects linked with minimum requirements and research-based training;
- Means and methods for linking micro-credentials to the traditional Higher Education cycles (Bachelor, Masters, and Doctoral studies);
- Added value of joint curricula designed and implemented in the European Universities Alliances for the students' professional development, considering aspects of certification, recognition, credentialing, portability, and transferability.

Furthermore, based on the common experiences shared by the participants and their interest in further scientific and academic cooperation, the conference organisers will invite participants to join follow-up groups on specific topics, aiming to create an active scientific network for future collaboration between academics.

PRACTICAL INFORMATION

The Conference will be organized in a blended format and participants are kindly invited to indicate in the registration form whether they will attend on site or remotely.

Please note that participation is free but registration is mandatory via the form available on the event webpage: <https://www.unica-network.eu/event/unica-edulab-european-conference2022/>

Deadlines for registration: Monday, 16 May for onsite attendance | Monday, 23 May for remote attendance

For any questions or doubts, please contact the UNICA Secretariat: laura.brossico@unica-network.eu
